Chapter 232: The Blossoming Power of the Second World Tree

The Second World Tree’s seeds had taken root across the multiverse, and with their growth, the very fabric of countless planets and moons was irrevocably changed. The once barren, inhospitable landscapes were now teeming with life, the influence of the Second World Tree spreading far and wide, altering the nature of existence itself.

1. Formation of Mana Lakes

As the seeds sprouted and the trees grew tall and mighty, each one began to manifest a mana lake around its base. These lakes were not merely pools of liquid but radiant sources of raw mana, pulsating with divine energy.

Mana Roots: The roots of the Second World Tree extended deep into the soil of the planets and moons, drawing raw mana from the very core of the celestial bodies. This mana, once dormant and untapped, now flowed freely through the tree’s vast system, nourishing it and transforming the landscape.

Raw Mana in Planetary Cores: Sung Jin-Woo’s divine law had irrevocably altered the core of every planet and moon where the Second World Tree had taken root. What was once merely the heart of a world had become a dynamic, ever-flowing source of pure, unrefined mana, essential for the life and ecosystems surrounding the trees.

2. The Transformative Power of the Fruits

The fruits borne by the Second World Tree were unlike any in existence. They were living embodiments of divine energy, infused with the essence of creation itself. Every time a fruit fell from the tree, it radiated immense power, and its fall triggered a grand transformation in the form of mythical creatures.

Mythical Creatures: The fruits gave birth to phoenixes, unicorns, dragons, and humanoid celestials, each one a product of the raw mana and divine energy contained within the tree’s fruit.

Phoenixes: Born from the flames of purified mana, these creatures embodied the eternal cycle of life, death, and rebirth, soaring across the skies of their new worlds.

Unicorns: Manifesting as symbols of purity and grace, unicorns brought hope and beauty to the realms they inhabited, their mere presence transforming the atmosphere of any world they graced.

Dragons: Born from the heart of the Second World Tree’s divine power, dragons emerged as apex predators, embodying might and dominion over their domains. Their vast wings stretched across the sky, heralding the beginning of a new age.

Humanoid Celestials: These divine beings, resembling angels, walked among mortals, offering wisdom and guidance. Their unmatched intelligence and power elevated any realm they entered, imbuing the inhabitants with a sense of purpose and reverence.

3. Transformation of the Realms

The impact of the Second World Tree’s growth was not limited to the creation of mythical creatures. It extended far beyond, bringing profound changes to the entire multiverse.

Planetary Changes: Planets and moons, once barren or inhospitable, were now enveloped in lush, vibrant ecosystems. Mana-rich lakes surrounded the World Trees, fostering new forms of life. Even the very atmosphere of once hostile worlds had been purified and thickened by the influx of mana, creating conditions in which life could thrive.

Mana Flow: As the roots of the World Tree delved deeper into the core of every planet and moon, a continuous, unbreakable flow of raw mana sustained both the trees and the creatures born from them. The once-static landscapes of the multiverse were now energized, radiating divine energy from the roots of the World Trees.

4. The Cycle of Creation and Life

Sung Jin-Woo’s divine intervention had established a never-ending cycle of creation that stretched across the multiverse. The Second World Tree was not merely a symbol of power—it was the lifeblood of the cosmos, ensuring that all realms would flourish in abundance.

Endless Growth: As long as the Second World Tree stood tall, its fruits would continue to fall, bringing new life to the multiverse. Each fruit born from the tree would transform into a new mythical creature, further enriching the cosmic tapestry.

Eternal Abundance: The raw mana flowing from the planetary cores ensured that every planet, moon, and realm would have an inexhaustible supply of energy. Whether the world was inhabited by elves, dwarves, dragons, or other races, the power of the Second World Tree guaranteed the prosperity of all.

5. The Divine Will of Sung Jin-Woo

Standing before the flourishing Second World Tree in the Absolute Realm, Sung Jin-Woo surveyed the vast changes that had swept through the multiverse. With a quiet, commanding voice, he spoke to his creations:

“From the depths of the planets to the furthest reaches of the stars, life shall bloom in abundance. The fruits of this creation will forever sustain the realms, and my will shall echo throughout the cosmos.”

His words reverberated through the multiverse, as the Second World Tree continued to grow, its fruits continuing to fall, and its roots continuing to expand, connecting every corner of existence under his divine influence.

The multiverse, once fragmented and filled with chaos, was now united under the eternal cycle of creation and life—the legacy of Sung Jin-Woo, the God of Shadows and Life.
